

I. BARANGAY PROFILE

GENERAL INFORMATION

Origin of Barangay Name. Barangay Dalupirip existed even before the Spanish came to the Philippines. It is known to be the main route of natives of the Upper Agno River going to the lowlands to barter their goods with lowland products, when lowlanders and the highlanders were not ‘cultured’ with each other. This place served as an area of reconnaissance and a place to spy enemies or rustlers.

During the Spanish colonization, natives of Upper Agno Valley spotted the place to be an ideal area for pasture purposes. Ingusan agreed with his brother Tinaw-an to send their younger step-brother, Shuminguez to settle in this place. Don Jose Smith Fianza found this barangay and named it ‘Shalupirip’.

According to old folks, Shalupirip could have been a combination of shalong and shipisip. The word shalong could be explained as road, trail or terrain usually declining, while shipisip could mean reconnaissance, to look into, to spy specially enemies or put something tightly as in cogon root, or make a thing flat. Until today, the name of the barangay is Shalupirip in Ibaloi, and registered as Dalupirip.

Early Settlers. The Fianzas were recorded in the early Spanish archives of Itogon to be first settlers in the area. Like the Ibaloi settlement of Tinongdan, the residents claim that as far back as anyone can tell, the Fianzas were the original settlers of the place.
